Thousands of people will be able to see the sun transform into a rare 'ring of fire' today as the second solar eclipse of the year arrives.

This 'annular solar eclipse' – when the moon blocks most of the sun – will take place this afternoon, although whether or not you'll get to witness it depends on your location.

It will be visible for lucky skygazers on Easter Island in the Pacific, as well as the south of Argentina and Chile, so Brits won't be able to see it.

However, if you're not in the right location, astronomers are livestreaming the event for the world to follow along online.

Here's MailOnline's guide to the annular solar eclipse – and how to watch it safely if you're lucky enough to witness in person.

Both annular and total solar eclipses occur when the moon casts its shadow over part of the Earth. It's just that with an annular solar eclipse, the moon is further away from Earth, so it appears smaller to us and therefore doesn't cover as much of the sun

A solar eclipse happens when the new moon passes between the sun and Earth, which means our view of the sun gets blocked.

While April's total solar eclipse blocked out the whole of the sun, today's event is only an annular solar eclipse, meaning the moon is further from us in its orbit and hence appears smaller.

And because the moon appears smaller, it doesn't quite cover the whole of the sun – instead resulting in the distinctive 'ring of fire'.

This ring of fire is simply the outer edge of the sun as it 'pops out' from behind the moon.

Professor Don Pollacco, an astronomer at the University of Warwick, told MailOnline: 'If the moon is slightly further away, it seems to be smaller than the sun disk.'

'At this time, you can see a ring in the sky called an annular eclipse.'

If you're lucky, the annular solar eclipse will appear as a perfectly-round orange circle in the afternoon, like a gigantic hula hoop.

Types of solar eclipse

Total: Moon completely blocks out the sun, casting a shadow on Earth

Annular: Moon doesn't completely cover the sun, resulting in a halo of sunlight known as a 'ring of fire' visible around the silhouette of the moon

Partial: Sun is only partially covered by the moon, making it look like the sun has had a 'bite' taken out of it

Hybrid: Combination of a total and an annular solar eclipse

Solar eclipses occur only at the new moon phase, when the illuminated side of the moon faces away from Earth

Meanwhile, other parts of South America including Brazil, Ecuador, Paraguay and Peru as well as Hawaii and New Zealand should see a 'partial' solar eclipse.

A partial solar eclipse is where the sun is only partially covered by the moon, making it look like the sun has had a 'bite' taken out of it.

Annular solar eclipse will only be visible along a relatively narrow path, known as the 'path of annularity'.

In any one location along the path, people will see a partial eclipse followed by the total eclipse, and then a partial eclipse again, as the moon moves in and then out of position.

Only around 175,000 people will see the annular solar eclipse sandwiched either side by a partial solar eclipse, according to timeanddate.com, which is livestreaming the event online.

And about another 239 million will only see the partial solar eclipse but no annular solar eclipse.

At Easter Island, the annular should be visible from just after 2pm, but in southeastern Argentina, it should be viewable at about 5:20pm.

While weather forecasters predict cloudy conditions for the relevant Chilean regions, Argentina should be clearer.

Hanga Roa, Easter Island (starting at 14:04 local time Wednesday)

It will then pass to the following (all times are local):

- Tortel, Aysén Region (Chile) (17:20)
- Villa O'Higgins, Aysén Region (Chile) (17:21)
- Cochrane, Aysén Region (Chile) (17:21)
- Gobernador Gregores, Santa Cruz Province (Argentina) (17:22)
- Puerto San Julián, Santa Cruz Province (Argentina) (17:24)
- Puerto Deseado, Santa Cruz Province (Argentina) (17:27)

It will finish in the south Atlantic Ocean, just north of the Falkland Islands (Falkland Islands will only see a 'partial' eclipse).

October 2: This map shows the 'path of annularity' as a deep pink line. It's here where people will see the sun as a 'ring of fire' (annular solar eclipse). Further out are areas that will see a partial eclipse - where it looks like the sun has had a 'bite' taken out of it. Exactly how much of the sun appears 'bitten out' depends on where you are. For example, if you are in northern Argentina you should see a sun with about 30-40% of its surface obscured at the most

A partial solar eclipse is where the sun is only partially covered by the moon, making it look like the sun has had a 'bite' taken out of it. Pictured, a partial solar eclipse at Skegness in Lincolnshire, England, March 20, 2015

Looking directly at the sun with the naked eye is dangerous and can cause permanent damage or blindness.

A simple pinhole projector, solar eclipse viewing glasses, which can be purchased online, or special solar filters are safer.

'During the partial phase of the eclipse it's especially important because the sun remains extremely bright,' Dr Robert Massey, deputy director of the Royal Astronomical Society, told MailOnline.

Unfortunately, if you're in Europe, the US, Asia, Africa or Australia, you have no chance of seeing the annular or partial solar eclipse.

The next total solar eclipse isn't visible in the UK for another 66 years.

Occurring on September 23, 2090, it will be the first total solar eclipse visible from Britain since August 11, 1999, and the first visible from Ireland since May 22, 1724.

However, there will be a partial eclipse visible for Brits on March 29 next year.

A solar eclipse contrasts with a lunar eclipse – where the Earth blocks the sun from the moon's perspective, casting a shadow on the moon's surface.

During a lunar eclipse, the moon turns a reddish colour due to how the sun's light interacts with Earth's atmosphere.
